Clares Practice Markdown

Here is the chosen annotation:

> When is comes to history I don't think you can be innovative in the same way you can with technology, if what you are looking for is what happened in the past. I can understand why some historians would be hesitant to release their material before they are done with their work. To avoid other academics beating them to the 'finish line'.

This annotation is based of of Open Notebook History by W. Caleb McDaniel.

I believe that history practices can be innovative just like technology. If anything we have seen so far in this class it is how much technology can be used to assist historians. We have looked at many articles on big data and using opensource services. These show that historians can use the innovative techniques found in technology.

I feel as though the second point in this annotation brings up many concerns about plagerism when posting ones original thoughts online. I believe copy rights can help this

The Battle for Open

How openness won and why it doesn't feel like victory

Martin Weller